Lonnie Chisenhall of the Cleveland Indians on May 2, 2011, the day of the first game of his Major League career. (credit: JEFF ALTENBERG/AFP/Getty Images) CLEVELAND (CBS Cleveland Sports) - Lonnie Chisenhall was booed lustily on Opening Day by an adoring crowd at Progressive Field. Just the same, he was the only starting player not wearing a Tribe uniform in the Indians' Cactus League opener against the Los Angeles Angels. Chisenhall is still in the mix to be Cleveland's Opening Day first baseman, but for the first time since Tribe fans booed him to the tune of 29-1, Chisenhall made it official Tuesday afternoon and decided to accept a minor-league assignment. "It's nice to be back in the big leagues and seeing everyone here and everyone is in a good mood," Chisenhall said. "It's great. It's fun." Chisenhall was Cleveland's Opening Day first baseman in 2009, when he had his best season in the Majors with an average of .294 and 19 home runs in 115 games. But a year later, his average fell to .262 with six homers in 80 games as the Tribe moved to designated hitter. The former University of Miami standout was one of the most popular players in Tribe history, but when the Tribe signed Asdrubal Cabrera last winter, it seemed clear the Indians no longer viewed Chisenhall as a No. 1 option. Chisenhall was batting .279 with six home runs and 23 RBIs in 74 games. "I think it was a really good call to send him down and get him some at-bats," manager Manny Acta said. "There's no doubt in my mind that if he continues to play up to his ability, we'll be back up here in a hurry."

Jun 5th, 2013 Peter Dreier writes: A headline in the August 4 New York Times reads "These Kids Are Taking Over the Science Class." The Times went on to claim, "more students are taking introductory-level science courses, and they come to them for reasons beyond just wanting to understand what the universe is made of." It's a claim that should make people suspicious. First of all, the public universities, where a majority of undergraduate students now take introductory-level science courses, are public universities. And a majority of undergraduates now study in them, as well. The authors of the Times story, Mary Katherine Ham and Ramin Jahanbegloo, imply that this is the reason why more students are taking introductory science courses. However, the Times authors' own source for this claim, the 2012 National Survey of Education and Demand for Postsecondary Education (NSEDL), reports that about 80 percent of college students in the United States are enrolled in bachelor's degree programs and that about 18 percent of college students in those bachelor's degree programs are enrolled in college-level science courses. The NSEDL also reports that about 90 percent of the freshmen in bachelor's degree programs took at least one science course. Of the 94 percent of students in bachelor's degree programs who took at least one science course, the majority (78 percent) took four science courses or fewer. Thus, it seems highly unlikely that most students are taking introductory-level science courses out of a general interest in science. Rather, a majority of bachelor's degree students are taking science courses as preparation for a science-based career, or for a bachelor's degree in another field. The Times also claims that the "most popular reason" why students take science courses
